How do you tell if a project is a success? March 1, 2016 No Comments 822
Success is measured in many different ways. We can look at its impact (impactful in some context). We can look at the time that has passed (when it will have been successful). We can talk about how it achieved its goal (success in that context). Let's think about the first definition: impact. We've all heard about "success" being measured based on the number of people affected by a project, but in many cases, the impact of a project is more important than the numbers. It is the value of the end product that determines whether it is considered successful or not. One of the most important aspects of a "success" is that it must have made a difference. It also must be (or at least appear to be) a significant result. I think that whether we are looking at a team of developers, a project to change a policy in a government system, or a community outreach program, the ultimate success is the same. The most important thing is to make a difference. Let's look at the time that has passed. If a project is a success in the time that it took to complete it, then it's a success. If a project requires too long, then there is the risk of dilution of the project's impact. Why is impact of any importance at all? We've all heard about the importance of solving problems quickly. We can look at impact by making sure that a project is done by its due date. The time that passes can be measured. The difficulty is how to assign responsibility for the time that a project takes. Do you assign some time to the "design" phase of a project and some time to the "development" phase of a project? Is it fair to place all of the blame for a project's delay in a single part of the team's work? So, how do we measure success? My point is that
